Meeting Notes
- Ken Stapleton, Executive Director works out of the Office of the University President
- 50 Block (1,000 acres) Development South of the University
- 25,000 students, 7,000 residents, 300 businesses, 24,000 employees
- Strategic Proximity – adjacent to downtown, highway frontage
- Engaging the community is not a natural act for Universities
- Community engagement and business development is not hardwired into the University – organizational capacity issue
- “Blurring Boundaries” “slowly filling in the moat between the University and the City” “chip away at the barriers, real or perceived”
- Cultural shift for the University to serve the community
- University President Priority – “the University can’t be an oasis in a sea of decay”
- Make no little plans for they have no magic to move men’s souls
- Marketplace has more talent and more capital than government but government can act as a catalyst
- Civic Investment Projects: new schools, rec centers, sidewalks, streets
- Even University investments are done with attention to civic design to fit into the neighborhood, e.g., push resident hall out to the curb with first floor retail, stadium complex is part of the public realm, 5 to 6 miles of bike paths, to create a great civic environment
- The key is understanding the anchors (downtown, University) in a way that the success of one is relevant to the success of the other
- Critical to connect the resources, e.g., river, quality neighborhoods, to the anchors
- Project seeks to integrate health and learning into the neighborhoods
- Service Days, Make a Difference Days – cultivating partnerships with the community
- Building investor confidence, momentum, constantly build excitement and always have more on the horizon
- Test the University’s commitment: How many departments have a line in the budget for community engagement?
